Welcome to Peaches' video series: An introduction by Prof Emma Crosbie

Hello. I'm Professor Emma Crosbie and I'm a Professor of Gynaecological Oncology at the University of Manchester.

Every year, thousands of people receive the news that they or their loved one have womb cancer, and it can be difficult for them to know where to turn for reliable and trustworthy information and support.

Together with our dedicated community of people whose lives have been touched by womb cancer, we have created a series of videos that we hope will empower you, and help you navigate your way through your womb cancer journey.

Everyone is different. No two people's womb cancer is the same. Likewise, not everyone wants the same amount of information or needs the same support. That's why we involved people with a wide range of experiences of womb cancer at every step along the way in the making of these videos.

[Peaches is working together with you, for you...]

First, we conducted a survey to identify the topics on which people affected by womb cancer most wanted support and information. Next, we ran a series of focus groups so that we could find out what detail the videos should contain. And finally, our community helped shape the video content, some of them even contributing to the filming itself.

To complement the videos, our community worked with us to produce a range of information resources, including a list of trusted organisations, that you can find on our website. Here, you will also find a range of other information about womb cancer and ways in which Peaches can further support you.

[Peaches is here for you]

We recognise that there are many more topics on which people affected by womb cancer would like information and support. So if you cannot find the specific information you are looking for on our website, we would love to hear from you. Your feedback is invaluable in our efforts to continually improve the information and support available to those affected by womb cancer.

And remember, you are not alone. Together, Peaches is here to support you every step of the way.
